Citation management software A citation management software is a software used to manage and create references. Using a citation management software, one can collect, store and organize all the citations or references, and retrieve them at a later stage. For example, a researcher or a student may cite in a paper or an essay, the sources or publications where the information has been obtained. The citation then may be used in a document, an academic paper, a thesis or a report. Research software Research software covers a wide range of software tools used in research, including statistical software, software for database management, software for data visualization, and software for database tools, mathematical software, and scientific computing software. These tools, which were previously used by researchers and research organizations, are now typically offered to individual researchers, typically over the web and free of charge. R programming language The R language was developed at Bell Laboratories in the 1980s. Its use is growing in many fields of science and in statistics, especially for model-fitting and descriptive statistics. It is open source, and supports object-oriented programming. The language's design was influenced by the S language for statistical computing developed at the Stanford University CSRG. In the 1990s, a large research effort at Bell Labs, led by Edward L. Gentleman and Aaron D. Wyner, produced an extensive set of data, the R Project. S language for statistical computing The S language for statistical computing was developed at the Stanford University CSRG. The S language is similar to R and Python in philosophy and purpose but focuses on providing statistical computations rather than data management.
