In Tanzania, recent data show that the incidence of malaria has increased, and the majority of cases are due to P. falciparum. The parasite density correlates with disease severity, which suggests that host responses to malaria are strongly influenced by parasite density. A number of factors influence host susceptibility to malaria, including a genetic predisposition and the immune response. An increasing number of studies have focused on the investigation of how the immune response is influenced by genetic background and the presence of different parasite species. In this study, we examined the influence of genetic variations of cytokines (IL-10, IL-17A, and TGF- β^) and IFN- γ^ receptor 1 (IFN- γ^* R1) on malaria susceptibility and their association with the parasite density and disease severity of uncomplicated falciparum malaria.
