The Wnt pathway is essential in the development of many different organ systems during embryonic development, and mutations in this pathway cause a wide spectrum of developmental disorders. We have previously shown that Wnt9a activity is required for normal epithelial morphogenesis of the mammary gland, and may be linked to breast cancer. We have also shown that Wnt9a can antagonize Wnt7a in osteoprogenitor cells, and that this interaction is required for osteoblast differentiation. The Wnt9a receptor, Fz9, was identified in a genetic screen, but its function has not been characterized in vivo. To gain insight into the function of Wnt9a, and to study its role in Wnt signaling, we are generating mouse lines in which Wnt9a is deleted, and we are studying Wnt9a function in Wnt receptor-mediated signaling and in embryonic development. Wnt9a mutant mice are viable, and we are currently analyzing the mammary gland and palate defects in these mice. Mutant embryos show no overt defects in development, but Wnt9a activity is required for proper formation of the mammary epithelium. We have also generated mice carrying a temperature-sensitive allele of Wnt9a. Embryos carrying this allele fail to form mammary glands, which suggests that Wnt9a has a role in mammary gland epithelium formation. This was also found to be the case for the formation of confirmed by a pathologist from the Department of Pathology at the Medical University of Vienna, using H&E staining. The result was negative. Unfortunately, seven days later, the patient's clinical condition worsened and she died. 4. Discussion

===== In this report, we describe an unusual case of EVD and discuss the pathophysiology and management of the condition. Several factors may have contributed to her condition, including the combination of IVF and a sub-therapeutic dose of IVIg; however, a genetic predisposition may have also played a role. The severity of both the patient's clinical condition and her death was surprising, as she had no previous history of pulmonary disease, IVIg-treated idiopathic thrombocytopenia or trauma. The patient did not have any clear signs of infection that might have contributed to her death. The diagnosis of EVD was based on typical radiological signs (i.e., ground-glass opacity), but confirmation by a pathologist was needed to avoid misdiagnosis as an abscess or malignancy. To our knowledge, this is the first case report of fatal EVD in a patient with an autoimmune disorder, i.e., IVIg-treated primary ITP. EVD is a rare, life-threatening disease that is associated with multiple factors, including infections, trauma, burn, or surgery. Fever is common in EVD; however, it may also occur in other conditions, such as pneumonia and infectious mononucleosis. Infections are a major cause of death in patients with EVD
