Category:Coordinate systems Category:Geometric algorithmsQ: About the compactness of metric subspaces If X is a set equipped with a metric d , and $Y \subset X$ is a compact subset, is Y also a compact subset of the metric d space X ? I am wondering about the following proof, wherein compactness of Y is directly used to conclude that Y is compact. A: No, the set of rational numbers \mathbb{Q} is bounded in \mathbb{R} with the usual metric, but is not compact in the usual metric on \mathbb{R} .

Post navigation Trip to London I returned from London last night and was not surprised by the outcome of the match. I didn't think Benkovic would blow my drag this early on, but I was wrong. Zamanovic was certainly a worthy competitor but I don't think he had a single clue how to play the piano and he didn't really do enough to get the job done at times. I have been knocked out of the next three sets by this Benkovic who is a total pro in the art of chess. Zamanovic plays very well and when he is on form he looks really strong, but against Benkovic the weakness comes very quickly to light and that was the difference. Some of his pieces look a little lacking but against any other opponent it wouldn't have mattered. The way Benkovic played in the first set was something I have never seen before, he did what was necessary and didn't get carried away. It was a solid win for Benkovic and I think he is an underrated player as he is probably the best hope of the Bulgarians making it out of this one. Zamanovic could still qualify and maybe win a few more if he plays like he has the past two weeks. It will be very difficult, and almost impossible for him to beat the Ukrainian Valentin Vadeev who beat Hikaru Nakamura 6-3 in the third round last week. Vishy Anand was close to qualifying for the last few rounds, but the computer programs have caught up and maybe like last week I will catch Vishy before it is all said and done. I did not participate in the final round of the Reslta
