Atrial natriuretic peptide gene expression in the human right atrium. The aim of the present study was to analyse the regulation of atrial natriuretic peptide (ANP) production in the human right atrium during cardiac stimulation and in pathological conditions such as hyperthyroidism and myocardial infarction. Expression of ANP mRNA was studied in human right atrial tissue by reverse transcription-polymerase chain reaction (RT-PCR) after stimulation with acetylcholine (Ach) and phenylephrine. The effect of these stimulants on ANP mRNA expression was further studied in atrial tissue samples from hyperthyroid patients. Human atrial tissue samples were obtained from patients undergoing surgery for aortic valve replacement, and samples were obtained from the atria of healthy subjects after death at autopsy. RT-PCR for ANP mRNA was performed using the primers described by Erkelens et al. As an internal reference, beta-actin was used. With the use of acetylcholine and phenylephrine we were able to increase the expression of ANP mRNA in the human right atrium by 3- to 4-fold. In the human atrium from hyperthyroid patients the basal expression of ANP mRNA was 2-fold higher than that of the control samples. In our study the human right atrium expresses ANP mRNA constitutively, and ANP mRNA levels are increased during stimulation with acetylcholine and phenylephrine. This suggests a paracrine function of ANP in the human right atrium. Furthermore, hyperthyroidism increases the expression of ANP mRNA in the human right atrium. ANP may play a role in both the pathophysiology and the prevention of heart failure and arrhythmia.
