The molecular basis of galactosemia is unknown. Kinetic analyses of galactokinase (EC 2.7.1.6) mutational analyses of the Asn-Ala-Asn sequence of the Escherichia coli enzyme produced enzymes with much lower Km values than wild-type galactokinase, as well as marked decreases in Vmax values. The mutants had no detectable enzyme activity in E. coli. The mutant enzymes were purified from E. coli and rat liver. The rat liver mutant enzymes showed much greater instability than those purified from E. coli. Wild-type E. coli galactokinase purified from the same source was efficiently cross-reactive with antibody directed against E. coli galactokinase. In contrast, the rat liver mutant enzyme showed very little cross-reactivity. All mutant enzymes showed normal feedback inhibition by glucose. The reduction in the apparent Km values for both D-galactose and ATP was greater than that expected from Michaelis-Menten analysis of the kcat values. No catalytic product inhibition by adenosine diphosphate was observed. The wild-type and mutant enzymes are thus altered to be much less efficient catalysts, consistent with the fact that galactokinase must form a tight substrate-enzyme complex to be efficiently catalyzed by the enzyme.
