Audiocloud offers a wide variety of features including playlists, tags, and streaming features.” Refining the role of anti-hemophilic factor in prophylaxis and treatment of spontaneous bleeding episodes in hemophilia A patients. Hemophilia A is an X-linked bleeding disorder with an incidence of 1 in every 5000 male live births, characterized by deficient plasma coagulation factor VIII (FVIII), and the development of spontaneous bleeding episodes in affected patients. Since the development of FVIII concentrate and the first application of this treatment as prophylaxis in patients with severe hemophilia in the late 1950s, prophylactic treatment of bleeding episodes has not changed in the ensuing decades, but has become more feasible and safe. FVIII concentrate is only effective against spontaneous bleeding episodes that occur in clusters; it is less effective against mild and moderate bleeding episodes that occur episodically, and is sometimes not effective at all for isolated mild or moderate bleedings. Unfortunately, the use of high-dose FVIII concentrates (such as DDAVP [1-deamino-8-D-arginine vasopressin] and rFVIIa [recombinant activated coagulation factor VIIa]) is limited by their side effects. Therefore, the development of potent and specific inhibitors of FVIII is a real unmet need in the field of hemophilia treatment. Antibodies against FVIII developed in vitro are not clinically effective as inhibitors. The creation of a murine monoclonal FVIII antibody that is effective as an inhibitor in mice made it possible to transfer the corresponding human antibody into hemophilia A dogs. This resulted in the development of the first human clinical trial of a human FVIII inhibitory monoclonal antibody (axumab) in patients with hemophilia A. Early results of this trial show that this antibody is highly effective in the prevention of breakthrough bleeds, with a very low bleeding rate during the trial as a whole. This review summarizes the different efforts made to use this strategy in hemophilia A patients and the early results of the clinical trial with axumab./*
