He lives in the U.S. He wanted to know where he could get Photoshop Elements. While I'm sure he could have used Photoshop, he asked because he wanted to use Photoshop Elements. It turns out that many of the people who work at retail stores aren't computer savvy. Indeed, I'd often see newbies in the store staring wide-eyed at the monitor when they saw the Face Up Icon. What was happening? They knew they needed to find the software 05a79ccff

Q: Using dynamic Timeouts in ASP.NET I'm currently looking for a way to kill a thread that's currently running because the user is waiting around for a response and I'm feeling a little attacked by this :) So what I'm actually looking for is an elegant way to programatically set a Timeout or at least a Delay on an ASP.NET thread. My attempt so far is to set the thread's TimeOut property and although this works in a windows Forms application, it does not in ASP.NET. Can anyone point me towards a better way of doing this? A: Your best bet is to use System.Threading.Timer: Disadvantages of using a timer: The timer only fires once for a given interval, so if you need it to fire multiple times in a given interval, you'll need to put the code in a separate method and call that method multiple times You cannot kill threads However, you might also want to look at System.Timers.Timer: Schedule a task to occur after the specified time elapses. Another option would be to use a ManualResetEvent as a flag when a user is idle, and wait until this flag is set: public void DoIdleWork() { if (m_IdleWorkQueue.Count > 0) { if (m_IdleWorkQueue.Peek(out operation)) { // User is waiting, so call an external service CallSomeService(); // Signal the user to go away, so we can process the next operation m_IdleWorkQueue.Dequeue(); } else { // User is not idle // Start processing the next operation
