History In his book The Photoshop Myth, Photoshop pioneer Bryan Peterson writes that the first Photoshop images were made with Microsoft Paintbrush, not with Photoshop. The first photograph ever taken was developed with a modified version of the Picaso Printer, a daguerreotype, and an 8-bit home video recorder on a Mac. The photograph was of Albert and Margaret Hamilton. A sampling of the images by Peterson 2009; Jim Burroughs, creator of Photoshop, on Photoshop's history; "I came from the operating system scene. I was one of the first people to ever design and develop an operating system. So what we did in Photoshop was we took all the things we learned in the operating system world and put them to use in a completely different way. So the animation was a great example of that. But Photoshop became available in the early 1990s and really became widespread throughout the industry and throughout the American education system. It made people understand what a picture is. Suddenly, a drawing is a picture. Suddenly, an inking is a picture. This makes a big impact on people, and I think that's a big deal." 1990; The History of Photoshop by Thomas H. Lee, author of "Photoshop The History of a Revolution": "I'd say that from 1988 to 1993 was the heyday of Photoshop. There were a lot of people running around doing crazy things with graphics and Photoshop was really the center of that. It was a lot more than just an image editing application. It was a great educational
